Life in the village

I don't have a strong village feeling. There is a little pub and that is where most people go, although I tend to avoid it. The village always wants to know what you are doing and if you don't have too much contact with it in the pub, they don't learn too much. I just keep them guessing. The new people want a great community centre. People who have just arrived in a village always want to do something in it or to it. What exactly they are going to have in this centre I don't know. They keep talking about 'amenities', I suppose they mean a car-park and a big smart room. The young village people don't want this. They don't want to be organized and run. When their work is over they want go off in their cars to the bright light Ipswich.

They don't want dances with a record -player, they want to see the latest groups. The new people have a desire to hold together all the old people ways while at the same time making sure that they have all the latest things for themselves. The old village people don't see it like this at all. What they see is a choice between what is old and what is new. So they choose the new. You don't want more old things when you have had old things all your life, do you? The new people are often just kidding themselves that they are real village people. They don't just want to be accepted, they really want to take over their gentry traditions. This is why they have come to live in a village. They want to do things 'for the village' and it is all very exhausting if you happen to be an 'old villager' and you just want to be left alone. What I can't fathom is why a person who has got the wit to make enough money to come and live comfortably in the country, and have a centrally-heated house and a car, should want to put on entertainments in a hut. These people are just playing at village life-kidding themselves that they are genuine country Folk. They wear us out. When their work is done they want play in the village and when our is done we want play outside it. I suppose that sums it up.
